Tisch College Community Research Center Grants - Beyond Maria: Community Resilience, Systems of Care, and the Experiences of Puerto Rican families in Massachusetts	Massachusetts was one of the states that received the largest number of Puerto Rican climate refugees following Hurricane Maria. Grounded in principles of community resilience and employing a community-driven participatory research approach, this pilot project examines how local systems of care (SOC) responded to this crisis. Led by a community research team (The CRT), which is comprised of local PR leaders, activists, community-based organizations, and Tufts researchers, they are conducting a statewide scan of how local SOC attempted to meet the needs of the new arrivals. They also collect the first-hand stories of PR's climate refugees and are meeting with local providers to learn how they responded to the needs of this population. The goal is to identify system-level best practices as well as to develop a larger scale statewide participatory research action project that will focus on ensuring that local SOC are able to respond to the needs of children, families, and communities in an equitable and sustainable fashion during times of emergent crisis.	$12,000	Both	One-time	Puerto Rican individuals/ households who left PR following Hurricane Maria and are living in Massachusetts	City-wide	Direct Monetary Support to City of Boston Programs	Tisch College Community Research Center	PR community members

Tisch College Community Research Center Grants - From Civic Participation to Community Control: Assessing and Strengthening Participatory Planning for Commercial District Development without Displacement in Boston's Dudley Neighborhood	Tufts UEP and Dudley Street Neighborhood Initiative (DSNI) explores how civic engagement can strengthen capacity for community control over land use and economic development in Boston's Dudley neighborhood. DSNI and the City of Boston have been collaboratively leading a planning process for redevelopment of three key sites, including a former Citizens Bank building acquired by DSNI's community land trust, in Upham's Corner (on the Dudley neighborhood's eastern edge). This redevelopment process is a unique case because it involves a partnership between a city and community organization, where the community owns one of the redevelopment sites. It is also one of the few cases of commercial development being pursued by a community land trust. This project is conducting a participatory assessment of the impacts of civic participation and collaboration with City of Boston in the Upham's Corner revitalization process. They are conducting interviews with key stakeholders from City and other organizations as well as resident participants. This research will help DSNI, the City, and other stakeholders better understand and strengthen civic engagement that goes beyond merely resident participation to community control over the development process and outcomes.	$10,000	Both	One-time	Boston Residents, DSNI, and other community stakeholders	Roxbury & Dorchester	Direct Monetary Support to City of Boston Programs	Tisch College Community Research Center and Dudley Street Neighborhood Initiative	Urban and Environmental Policy and Planning at Tufts University
